geography

From Credo Reference

the discipline concerned with the description and explanation of the changing spatial relationships of terrestrial phenomena in interrelation with humanity As such, geography is both a physical science and a social science, ranging from physical geography, on the one hand (including geomorphology and climatology), to human geography on the other. The coverage of the discipline means that it overlaps with sociology and social anthropology, and with other social sciences such as economics. In the past, geography has drawn on sociology more often than sociology has on geography. More recently, however, the exchange of ideas has been greater in both directions,...
